Yeshiva U. Plans First Unit In $30 Million Program

Officials of Yeshiva University announced plans for a five-story, $3,000,000 class-room and administration building on the southwest corner of Amsterdam Avenue, and 185th Street, in New York. It will be the first construction in a $30,000,000 dual-campus development program announced in November by Dr. Samuel Belkin, Yeshiva president, says the New York Herald Tribune. Also on the drawing boards are a new gymnasium and recreation center and another dormitory, with a projected total cost of $6,000,000, at the university's Washington Heights center. They are included in the development program.

The classroom and administration building, designed by H. I. Feldman, is the first building by the University at its main center since completion of the Leah and Joseph Rubin residence hall in 1957.

The new structure will include thirty-five classrooms, three lecture halls and three conference rooms. There will also be a student lounge, student union plaza, facilities for the college newspaper, yearbook, and Student Council, a bookstore, and student lockers.

Also included will be offices of the president, the dean of Yeshiva College, the dean of men, heads of schools and admissions and the registrar and bursar. Faculty offices and lounge, the community service division, alumni activities and public relations and production departments also will be housed in the building.

The projected gymnasium and recreation center, Dr. Belkin said, will meet the need for recreational athletic facilities. Until now, teams have rented a gymnasium for sports activities.

In addition to the plans at Washington Heights, the institution is also planning a second campus. It will be part of the Riverside Amsterdam slum-clearance project on 135,000 square feet of land between Amsterdam Avenue and Broadway, from 83d to 86th Streets.

This center will include classrooms for the Stern College for Women and the Teachers Institution for Women, says the New York Herald Tribune. It will also have a women's dormitory and classrooms for the graduate school of education, the school of social work and the graduate school of mathematical sciences.

League Warns U. S. On Religion As Election Issue

The head of the Anti-Defamation League of Bnai Brith appealed to the American people for a "frank discussion of the injection of bigotry" into the 1960 election campaign. Henry Edward Schultz, national chairman of the agency, said that "while the discussion so far has turned on the qualifications of a Catholic for President," it should instead be centered on "why religion is an issue at all in the face of the Constitutional stricture barring religion as a test for office."

"This must be done to preserve the political health of the nation," he went on, reports the New York Times. "We have reached a point in our history where it is no longer possible to sweep this issue of bigotry under the rug. Not only religious leaders — Protestant, Catholic, and Jewish — but the entire electorate must help close the gap between our Constitutional provision and our national practice."

Mr. Schultz spoke at the annual national executive committee meeting of the League at the Savoy Hilton Hotel, in New York. The League released a study of anti-Catholic utterances in the Presidential primaries. The study, prepared under the supervision of Arnold Forster, general counsel, and civil rights director at the League, noted "a distressing amount of bigoted expression about a Catholic in the White House."

The report set forth that "anti-Catholic extremists today are circulating petitions on a large scale demanding of both Republican and Democratic National Conventions that they nominate no Catholics for President or Vice President."

Four periodicals were said to have "strong anti-Catholic bias" and to be "part of a long list of extremist and anti-Catholic tracts operating in the current political campaign." At the same time, the League released a study on the history of prejudice in politics. It was written by Charles P. Taft, former Mayor of Cincinnati, in collaboration with Bruce L. Felknor, executive director of the Fair Campaign Practices Committee, of which Mr. Taft is the chairman.

Research for the study, entitled "Prejudice and Politics," was begun by Paul Tobenkin, a member of the staff of The New York Herald Tribune, who died last year. He was noted for his coverage of racial and religious bigotry and discrimination, says the New York Times. Mr. Taft called for steps to check the growth of religious bias in the 1960 election.

"Once again the number one target of prejudice in the political arena seems to be the Catholics," he wrote. "Now not one national leader, as in 1928, but literally a handful, are entirely conceivable prospects for a Presidential or a Vice Presidential nomination. And again, discussion of the pros and cons of a Catholic candidate fill the air, as they did in 1927 and 1928."

Ousting Of Israeli Envoy To Argentina Over Eichmann Constitutes Break

Argentina declared the Israeli Ambassador unwelcome as the latest move in the dispute with Israel over the kidnapping of Adolf Eichmann, accused Nazi war criminal, in Argentina two months ago.

Foreign Minister Diogenes Taboada called the ambassador, Arieh Levavi, to his office, reports the New York Times, and notified him of the Government's decision that he was persona non grata, but did not set a deadline for the Ambassador's departure.

Argentina delivered a note to Israel setting forth Argentina's dissatisfaction with Israel's delay in making "adequate reparations" for the kidnapping of Eichmann in Argentina by "volunteers." Without elaborating, the United Nations Security Council had recommended that Israel make "adequate reparations."

Argentina has reiterated her demand that Israel return Eichmann, who as head of the Gestapo's Jewish section is accused of having ordered the extermination of 6,000,000 European Jews. The Argentinians also demand that Israel punish those "responsible for violating Argentine territory."

Mr. Levavi, who is 48 years old, was assigned as Ambassador to Argentina in December, 1958. His wife and two daughters are with him. He was Israeli Minister-Counselor in the Soviet Union in the late Nineteen Forties and later became Ambassador to Yugoslavia. Eichmann is now being prepared to stand trial for his life in Israel.

The recent development constituted a virtual break in Argentine-Israeli diplomatic relations, which have deteriorated since the Argentine Ambassador to Israel, Rodolfo Garcias Arias, was recalled in mid-June, says the New York Times. It was announced, that he would not return to Tel Aviv, where the Chargé D'Affaires, Eduardo Colombo, is now in charge of the embassy.

The capture of Eichmann became known May 23 when Premier David Ben-Gurion announced that the German was under arrest in Israel and would stand trial for his life. Captured in Argentina, Eichmann was reported to have been put aboard a returning El-Al Airlines plane that had taken an Israeli delegation to Argentina's 150th anniversary fete.

President Arturo Frondizi was "thoroughly indignant" at the kidnapping, which he considered an affront to Argentina. Officials in Argentina were not convinced or pacified by the Israeli explanation that Eichmann had gone voluntarily to Israel from Argentina to stand trial.

Argentina insisted that Eichmann be returned and the issue was taken to the United Nations. On June 23 the Security Council asked Israel to make "appropriate reparation" for the unauthorized transfer of Eichmann from Argentina.

However, the United States, Britain, France, and the Soviet Union made clear before the Security Council adopted the Argentine request that they did not interpret it as one for the return from Israel of the former Nazi official.

On June 28 Argentina asked Israel to state "officially" what she intended to do about the Council's recommendation. On July 5 Israel asked Argentina to consider the Eichmann case closed. The note said that three of the eight supporters of the Security Council resolution on the subject had made it clear that they regarded the expression of views by the Council and an apology by Israel as "adequate reparations" for the violation of Argentine sovereignty.

"No member of the Council has offered any challenge to this interpretation of the resolution," the Israeli note said, reports the New York Times. The Israelis thus tacitly but firmly rejected the demand in the Argentine note of June 8 for the return of Eichmann.

Feuds Mark Israeli Struggle Over Chief Rabbi Post This Month

Col. Shlomo Goren, chief chaplain of the Israeli defense forces and Premier David Ben-Gurion's candidate for the Chief Rabbinate, is favored to be elected to the highest ecclesiastic post in Israel. Polling has been set for August 26. The selection is to be made by an electoral college comprising forty-two rabbis and twenty-eight laymen.

Two Chief Rabbis and the Supreme Rabbinical Council of six members are to be elected. Rabbi Goren, an Ashkenazic (occidental) rabbi, is seeking the post that has been vacant since the death of Chief Rabbi Isaac Halevy Herzog in July, 1959, says the New York Times. Rabbi Itzhak Nissim, the incumbent Sephardic (oriental) Chief Rabbi, is standing for re-election.

Powerful figures in the "old guard" of religious leadership have been fighting to stop Rabbi Goren. The Minister for Religious Affairs, Rabbi Yaakov M. Toledano, has been leading a fight against Rabbi Nissim's candidacy.

The politics that has marked the elections has caused some antagonism in Israel. "The politicians," observed Maariv, a Tel Aviv newspaper, "appear more concerned with who shall influence the Chief Rabbis than with the influence the rabbis shall have over the flock."

The feud between Chief Rabbi Nissim and the Minister for Religious Affairs stems from the last rabbinical elections five years ago. Rabbi Toledano, who had been Sephardic Chief Rabbi of Tel Aviv, had sought promotion to the Chief Rabbinate of Israel. The National Religious Front, which comprises the Hapoel Hamizrachi and Mizrachi parties, supported Rabbi Nissim, who was elected.

Mr. Ben-Gurion says that he is against mixing religion with politics and that he does not recognize the justification for the existence of religious political parties. By wresting the Ministry of Religious Affairs from them, he has deprived the parties of one of their major sources of power in the religious community. He now hopes to break their control of the rabbinate.

Hitherto, the religious parties monopolized the elections. The organizing committee that establishes the electoral college is appointed jointly by the Ministry and the outgoing Supreme Rabbinical Council, says the New York Times. As long as the religious parties ran the Ministry, they worked closely with the rabbinate and virtually controlled the elections.

The rabbinic "old guard" and the National Religious Front do not question the scholarship or fitness of Rabbi Goren but they oppose him because he is regarded as an instrument used by Mr. Ben-Gurion to weaken their position. They prefer the election of Rabbi Joseph H. Soloveichik, of Boston, or Chief Rabbi Iser J. Unterman of Tel Aviv.

The elections had been scheduled originally for last February, when the five-year tenure of the outgoing rabbinate expired, but they could not be held because of an impasse between the Ministry and the rabbinate.

Rabbi Toledano had drafted regulations providing that candidates must be Israeli citizens under the age of 70. These clauses would have barred Rabbi Soloveichik, a United States citizen, and Rabbi Unterman, who was 73, says the New York Times. The Minister later withdrew the controversial clauses and each side eventually named four representatives to the organizing committee.

Jacob Goldfarb And Brandeis University

Jacob A. Goldfarb epitomizes that kind of success story Americans seem to love so well — the saga of the youth in straightened circumstances who lifts himself by the proverbial bootstraps to a position of great eminence and respect in his community; the man who becomes a titan of industry by dint of hard work, self-sacrifice and great native intelligence. Nothing in his early life could prophesy his future successes. He was born in Poland in 1895, but remained at home and hearth only until he was old enough to leave. At the age of eight years Jacob departed for Germany. He left very little family behind. Two sisters had already gone; his father had died when Jacob was six months old.

For three years he earned a perilous living as a horse and wagon driver in Berlin. In 1907 he became one more lonely face in the hordes of Europeans crowding the steerages of America-bound steamers. In New York City the young immigrant went to live with his sisters in a lower East Side tenement. He enrolled at P.S. 188, then the largest school building in the city. He graduated in three years and attended briefly the Townsend High School. He was taking, he thought, the first step in an educational process leading to the profession of medicine, or, if not medicine, teaching.

It was not to be. And in the reflected light of his later life, one can easily imagine that either medicine or education has suffered accordingly. It was the lack of funds that forced Goldfarb to leave school, and he has regretted it all his life. Perhaps we see here the first inkling of the mold and pattern that shaped his life and cast him in his present image. His first job, after he quit school, was as a delivery boy for Western Union. He recalls that the company paid him two cents per telegram delivered and nothing if there was nobody home. He also ruefully remembers that there were seldom any tips.

One job led to another. For two years he was a runner on Wall Street at $9.00 a week. Strangely, he didn't like the job very much, but indirectly it led him into the garment industry. With other runners he had invested two dollars in stock, and lost it. Perhaps because he might be tempted to do it again, Mr. Goldfarb left the world of finance to become a utility boy in the garment industry. It was to be his life except for overseas service in the World War I Army.

Then, the big break: Impressed by his intelligence and perseverance, a friend recommended him to an underwear manufacturing company, and, at the age of 26, Mr. Goldfarb found himself running a factory for the H. B. Ferguson Company in Indianapolis, Indiana. This was hardly a portent of things to come, for the business failed four years later. Turning this apparent defeat into a challenge, Mr. Goldfarb counted his savings, counselled with his friends, took a long, hard look at the industry and the peculiarities of American economics and founded the Union Underwear Company in 1926.

And here, too, there is revealed a facet of this remarkable man that has earned him the admiration and respect of vast numbers of people. One of the forces that prompted the decision to be his own boss was his dislike of the way his former employers had forced their customers to take on high-priced lines in order to get the low-priced ones. "I decided to make only what they were losing money on, on the cheap lines," he says as reported in a Fortune Magazine article last year. The company grew — and grew. By 1955, its volume was better than $27,000,000 per year.

In recalling the building years, Mr. Goldfarb doubts he had any

● CANADIAN JEWISH CONGRESS ●

At the invitation of the Congress, Rabbi Eliezer Silver, of Cincinnati, Ohio; and Rabbi J. Soloveitchik, of Boston, Mass., rabbinic authorities, examined the new method of restraint of animals prior to Shechita, (ritual slaughtering for food), which was developed by the Canada Packers in Toronto, Ont., to comply with the new regulations on humane slaughter of food animals (obligatory after December 1, 1960), and gave their full approval. They were accompanied by Rabbi S. M. Zambrowsky, of Montreal, chairman of the national religious welfare committee of Congress; Sydney M. Harris, of Toronto, chairman of the national joint public relations committee of Congress; Meyer Gasner, of Toronto, vice-chairman of the Central Region, and chairman of its Orthodox division. The method approved consists basically of a restraining pen into which cattle are directed from a chute and in which the animal is confined on both sides while standing on its feet. The method was also viewed by the general manager of the Ontario Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, who stated in writing: "I am of the opinion that this represents the most humane and practical method of presenting an animal for ritual slaughter currently available, and on the strength of this am confident that our Society and the provincial animal welfare movement will readily accept it as fully complying with the requirements of humane slaughter." The new method received the official approval of the Department of Agriculture as required by the regulations on humane slaughter of food animals. The approval given by Rabbi Silver and Rabbi Soloveitchik is the culmination of many months of testing various methods; of interviews with the officials of the Department of Agriculture; and discussions with local rabbis. A special meeting was held in Montreal of the Congress committee on humane slaughter, with Monroe Abbey, Q.C., chairman of the national executive of Congress; Rabbi Zambrowsky and Sydney M. Harris, chairman of the special committee; Harold Lande, Q.C., chairman of the Eastern Region; Saul Hayes, the executive vice-president of Congress; Dr. Samuel Levine, secretary of the national religious welfare committee of the Congress, present.

Instead of waiting impatiently for the coffee break, it is much better practice to eat a good breakfast. Citrus fruit juice, whole grain cereal, and egg, with whole grain toast and coffee will compensate for the twelve to sixteen hours since the previous meal.

driving ambition to become wealthy or successful. Even today he protests with what one reporter calls "the soft guile of Seventh Avenue" that he has barely been able to make out. This in spite of Union Underwear's position as the biggest maker of men's underwear in the country. During the time that he was building his business, Mr. Goldfarb lived in Indianapolis, rapidly becoming a key figure in his community and a ready participant in its charitable and philanthropic activities. In 1930 he married a pretty Terre Haute girl, Bertha Leventhal, who has shared her husband's love for giving and who is his partner in all community benefactions.

In 1931, Mr. Goldfarb opened a factory in Frankfort, Kentucky, and in 1936 the couple moved to Louisville. Former Kentucky Governor A. B. "Happy" Chandler, in a recent visit to Brandeis University, recalled that Mr. Goldfarb "is that happy combination of dedicated community servant and forward-looking business man to whom people are just naturally attracted. His home and purse are always open to the needs of the less privileged and the needy."

"I like to open plants in smaller communities," Mr. Goldfarb has said. "It's not so much for economy reasons, but I feel a plant or a factory in a small community helps the family structure of the town. If you give people, especially young people, a chance to work, then they don't go away to metropolitan areas where they often get into trouble."

By 1944, his business had grown so large that Mr. Goldfarb was forced to move his operations to New York City. "But," he emphasizes, "we just have offices here for the convenience of our customers. I still prefer to keep the plants in smaller communities where they need the factories." There are four plants in Alabama, three in Kentucky, and one in South Carolina. Together, they employ more than 5,000 people. In each of the communities Mr. Goldfarb is a generous participant in the affairs of churches, synagogues, colleges, and many other non-profit groups. At Campbellsville College in Campbellsville, Kentucky, for example, he has been named "Man of the Year" and has been honored at its graduation exercises. He has contributed $50,000 to Sarah Lawrence College. He has been honored by the Associated Men's Wear Retailers of New York.

Seven years ago he came to Brandeis University in Waltham, Mass., as the guest of a friend. Touched by what this country's first Jewish-sponsored, non-sectarian University was doing, he contributed a modest sum. In succeeding months he got to know the president of Brandeis University, Dr. Abram L. Sachar and began to share his enthusiasm for the University, "where, for the first time, Jews could play host to non-Jewish students," whereas the situation had heretofore been reversed.

A rapport had been established between President Sachar and Jacob Goldfarb. On the one hand, the distinguished man of letters, scholar, educator, and academician. On the other, the humble, self-effacing man of little academic training who, more than most, understood the vital importance of education. They understood and admired each other, these two men from different worlds, and as their friendship grew and ripened, Mr. Goldfarb decided that his token gift to Brandeis should be increased to a more substantial grant.

Early one morning in 1956, the day after Passover, Dr. Sachar received a phone call from the Goldfarbs. "I've been thinking about our conversations regarding a new library for Brandeis," Mr. Goldfarb said. "We need it and I'd like to help. I know that the women's committee has been working hard to raise the funds and that they have already made a substantial commitment. We'd like to add $1,000,000 to what they have raised." After scolding Mr. Goldfarb for not calling collect, Dr. Sachar expressed his thanks, hung up the receiver, and promptly took his staff to lunch. As building plans progressed, the Goldfarbs added another half-million dollars, which brought their total gifts to Brandeis to some $1,750,000.

A few years ago, Jacob Goldfarb began to speculate about what might happen to the business when he dies. He worried that it might be liquidated and throw his employees out of work. For technical reasons, placing Union Underwear on the stock exchange and transforming it into a public corporation was not feasible. He finally worked out a deal with the Philadelphia and Reading Co. whereby Mr. Goldfarb received two and one-half million in cash, $9 million more to be paid within five years out of Union's earnings. He also got $1 million in P&R stock and retained the presidency.

Jacob and Mrs. Goldfarb then began their wholesale disbursement of funds to worthy groups. In addition to those already mentioned, their largess has been dispensed to the United Jewish Appeal, cancer research, and in varying amounts to many other philanthropic and charitable organizations. Jacob Goldfarb is often asked if it is still possible to do what he has done. "I think it is," he says. "I used to have a young man working for me. I paid him $75.00 a week. He now heads a ten-million-dollar business and is one of our top competitors. He heads the BVD Company."

Jacob Goldfarb has come a long, long way. On June 15, 1960, a 65th birthday dinner in his honor climaxed a nationwide drive now going on which seeks to raise $450,000 to be presented as an Endowment and Development Fund to Brandeis University in honor of him and his wife.

His work day still averages twelve hours and his immediate plans include a visit to Israel to see how his investments are working out. "I don't expect to reap any profit there," he says, "but I do want to set up a factory or two, probably in a smaller town." At 65 years of age, when most men seriously begin to contemplate retirement, Jacob Goldfarb, buoyed up by a lifetime of service and accomplishment, can find no time to relax. He is enjoying life too much.

But What About The Future?

BY DR. JUDAH J. SHAPIRO, OF NEW YORK, SECRETARY OF THE NATIONAL FOUNDATION FOR JEWISH CULTURE, INC.

Arising out of a resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the Council of Jewish Federations and Welfare Funds in San Francisco during November of last year, it was in the period between the past Chanukah and Shevuoth that the National Foundation for Jewish Culture became a functioning reality. The presence of the National Foundation for Jewish Culture suggests that Jewish culture is now a working assignment and not merely a talking matter. The Foundation's mandate is not only to bring support to Jewish cultural agencies but to strengthen the communities themselves by restoring an awareness of the historic and dynamic connection of the Jewish heritage with the Jewish community's present efforts, and to assure a Jewish future in America.

No emphasis, no comment even, is necessary on the great, present-day involvement of American Jews in Jewish life. It is obvious and apparent how much activity and how many people are encompassed within the multiplicity of Jewish organizations, movements, services, and philanthropies.

In all these, there is only now beginning to be exhibited an uneasiness about the future, about what will happen in all these activities in that time to come when its present leadership will have passed. While it is an age-old tradition for an adult generation to doubt its inheritor's capacity to be similarly adult, we see an increasing starkness to these doubts and fears. And there may be good reason for this!

During this past year, two personal experiences pointed up the difference in the nature of the fears of our fathers and of ourselves. In the first instance, I was a participant in an imaginative series of seminar sessions arranged for the Board members of the several Federation-supported agencies in a metropolitan area. The subjects under discussion ranged over all the areas of service by this community, and my own assignment was to discuss problems of Jewish culture in America.

At the conclusion of this part of the program, one gentleman who occupied a leading directive post rose to express his worries about the future and explained that with all his activity and support, within the Jewish community, he could not see any similar interest on the part of his twenty-year old son. My comment was that though I did not know him personally, I was prepared to make a guess that when this gentleman was himself twenty years old, his father very likely had given him up as a bad bargain for Jewish life. "You know," he said, "you're absolutely right."

On the second occasion, I was being driven back to my hotel from a public meeting in one of our larger communities by a man who was telling me how much he personally enjoyed a Jewish cultural experience. He told of a stimulating lecture which had been delivered some two weeks earlier at the Jewish Community Center by one of America's outstanding Jewish historians. He thrilled to the telling of that evening's experience.

It was at this point that I asked whether he had a son and if so of what age. He had a twenty-year-old boy. Then I asked him whether he had stopped to consider who might give a similarly thrilling lecture on Jewish history for his son, when this boy attained the father's present age. He was visibly shaken by the question, and with a sad whimsicality said, "That's such an important point."

What, then, is the difference in the two situations? Our fathers may have had concern and doubts about the intensity of the commitments of their sons to Jewish life, and surely about their knowledgeability, but, on the other hand, they knew that within the Jewish community there were teachers and scholars who would continue the Jewish tradition of learning and teaching with more or less, better or worse, students. Today, our neglect in assuring ourselves of the Jewish learned professions to write, to teach, to study and to interpret makes us realize that Jewish continuity is based upon scholarship rather than on the number of the members and the degree of activity in organized Jewish life.

Before, the concern was whether the children would wish to learn; today, the question is: who will teach them if they should wish to learn? This is pertinent not only to the Jewish education of the young, but must also be applied to the level of adult activity within which Jewish knowledge always had its respected place and served as motivation for the many great moments and acts of heroism and achievement in Jewish history.

In the short term of the Foundation's existence to date, it has been noticeable that in the field of Jewish scholarship in America today there are no flames, but there are at least embers with the potential of being fanned into flame. It has become abundantly clear that no one of the Jewish cultural agencies suffers more, and that none overcomes more easily, the general conditions of the state of Jewish culture in America.

That is to say, that without the students who study and aspire to careers in the learned Jewish professions, no important books will be written, edited, or translated in the future by any of the present Jewish cultural agencies; no libraries, no archives, no record-keeping will be maintained for scholars, historians, and authors of the future, under the sponsorship of any of the existing cultural agencies. When the flame of Jewish culture burns low in the community, a darkness envelops every Jewish cultural agency, whether its budget is sustained at a higher or lower level.

The embers of hope were seen in the nature of the contacts made with the Foundation by would-be Jewish scholars, by Jewish writers, by individuals yet competent to make a contribution to Jewish cultural endeavor. What has not yet been demonstrated is the understanding by the Jewish community of the precious quality of each aspirant, young and old.

As of now, it has not yet been possible to grant the requested support to a young American-born graduate student to complete a doctorate in Judaic studies at a leading university. It has not been possible to make the requested grant to a notable Yiddish author, now seventy-two years of age, whose potential contribution is of the highest. It has not been possible to undertake the correction of the general lack of trained librarians for local and national institutions, though there would appear to be the candidates to be trained for such careers.

These are the embers from which may come brightness and warmth for cultural enterprise, when, in addition to our talk and discussions of the problems, there come the resources to act. At the beginning of this new year, there is this to report that there are currently more good ideas, more hopeful prospects, more possibilities for correcting our situation than there is visible, tangible, and measureable support for dealing with them.

It is one of the great privileges of our time to sit on that spot to which are addressed the expressions of hope of the field of Jewish scholarship, the inquiries for guidance by organized Jewish communities, and the interest of individuals to be related to the process of renaissance. It is our impression at this time that each has its own role and must persist in its fulfillment.

The agencies must continue to apply themselves, as they always have, to their respective programs, sustaining the highest standards in their work even though they are currently without the resources of funds and personnel which they require. The communities, through welfare funds and federations, must add to these resources, even while they seek a sound rationale for their involvement, and they must act as "friends of Jewish culture" not only on the national level but in encouraging its every manifestation within the local communities.

The great third partner is more elusive, less definable, and in addition so new to this field. It is the "g'vir," the patron, the Maecenas. The impression we receive is that the potential patron has grown distant from the cultural field as a result of the real demands that have been made upon him and his resources for the overwhelming costs of fighting the Nazi effort of extermination of the Jews, aid to the survivors of that battle, rescue of Jewish brethren from Moslem lands, and building the State of Israel.

All these efforts correctly received the highest priority, while alongside these programs there were maintained and increased proud institutions of Jewish communal service and religious life here. As a result, there have been two consequences. The first is that the truly responsible Jewish "g'vir" (patron) has not yet recognized the need to return, at least in some measure, to the support of the intellectual fabric of Jewish life, from his magnificent battles to rescue, revive, and restore Jewish people.

The second is that the organized forms of fund-raising, national, international, and local have for so long held him in close rein because of the magnitude of the welfare needs that they have not yet realized that their very causes stand in jeopardy today. It is a sound principle to follow that where there is commitment to Jewish culture, there is necessarily commitment to Jewish philanthropies.

The reverse is patently untrue. For his own sake, for the sake of Jewish continuity in America, and for the sake of the continuing readiness to respond to whatever philanthropic need may lie ahead, the patron, the philanthropist, must be restored to the intellectual core of Jewishness.

The National Foundation for Jewish Culture throughout the coming year will exercise its combined skills and representative leadership, both lay and professional, to serve the Jewish cultural agencies and the communities. It will really be able to deal with the significant and the programmatic issues to the extent that individuals will present themselves to support a student, a scholar, a writer; to make possible an investigation of the treasures of the Jewish record in America presently scattered and requiring orderly arrangement, while setting up a process of regular accumulation of such documents; to publish a volume of scholarly worth without the need to be governed by the present weakness of the market for such material.

Arthur Pascal, 24 Devon Avenue, Montreal, has been appointed chairman of the joint campaign for the Combined Jewish Appeal-United Israel Appeal; and the Rescue and Survival Fund, to raise $3,905,800 from November 7 to 21. He is a past president, and honorary president of Neighbourhood House; a trustee and member of the executive committee of the Federation of Jewish Community Services, of Montreal; and vice-chairman of the board of trustees of the Jewish General Hospital. Mr. Pascal is also a past master of the Lodge of The Covenant No. 100, A. F. and A. M.; past president of the Montefiore Club; and a member of the board of trustees of Temple Emanu-El.

Rabbi Stanley Borcovitch, aged twenty-six years, son of Mr. and Mrs. Ralph L. Borcovitch, 4733 Westmount Boulevard, Montreal, has been appointed Rabbi to the oldest congregation in Bucks County, Pa., Congregation Tiferes Beni Israel, in Hatboro, on September 1. Rabbi Borcovitch is a graduate of Montreal schools. He received a B.A. degree from Columbia University, in New York, and was ordained as an Orthodox Rabbi at the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary of Yeshiva University, in New York. He participated in all scholastic and athletic activities. Rabbi Borcovitch is a third generation Canadian. While serving the community in Bucks County, he will complete courses at The Dropsie College for Hebrew and Cognate Learning, in Philadelphia, Pa., where he is a candidate for a Ph.D. Degree. As a student he officiated at High Holiday auxiliary services at Congregation Beth Ora, in St. Laurent, and this past Passover he was honoured by being asked to occupy the pulpit of the Chief Rabbi of Montreal, Rabbi S. Hershorn, at Congregation Shiloh, on the first day; and on the seventh day of Passover he occupied the pulpit of Rabbi Wilfred Shuchat of Congregation Shaar Hashomayim.

ABC and HIGH STANDARDS GO TOGETHER

In qualifying for membership in the Audit Bureau of Circulations, publishers are doing more than providing advertisers with the facts about the circulation of their publications.

They are also giving active support to the principle that advertising space should be bought and sold only on the basis of verified information — a principle that has contributed in large measure to the interests of all advertisers.

The Canadian Jewish Review is still the only Jewish publication in Canada, printed in any language, reaching the Jewish community, which is not sponsored by a group or organization, and which has the distinction of being a member of the Audit Bureau of Circulations.
